

Pictures of railway equipment broken and twisted by demolition and bombing have been plentiful in this war, but this shot at the right is one of the most dramatic. It was taken at the Epinal, France, roundhouse and clearly demonstrates the effectiveness of the U.S. Air Force in breaking up enemy transportation. The job of cleaning it up, and re-establishing lines of supply for Allied troops, was a big one for the MRS. (Lidikay)

The scene below was not a part of the VE-Day celebration. It is an example of what happens when fire breaks out in a train-load of ammunition. This one occurred at Marseilles, and several men of the 713th Ry Operating Bn were decorated for their action in saving other loaded cars from the flames. A phosphorus bomb let go just as this photo was snapped. (Krinke)
